UDC Speaker Gives Talk On General Joseph E. Johnston

Excerpts of remarks of Mrs. K. E. Coleman at the October meeting of the Appomattox County Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy held on Thursday, October 17, 1963.

General Joseph E. Johnston, great strategist and conservative Confederate leader, was born near Farmville, Virginia, February 3 1807. His father, Peter Johnston, served in the American Revolution, and later became a distinguished jurist. His mother was a niece of Patrick Henry. General Johnston was graduated from West Point in the class with General Robert E. Lee. He served in the Black Hawk and Mexican wars, and was severely wounded in the latter. In 1860 he was appointed quartermaster general, United States Army, with the rank of Brigadier General. On April 22, 1861, he resigned his commission, and was appointed General and assigned to the command of the Shenandoah Valley. He commanded a force at Harper's Ferry and formed a junction with General P G. T. Beauregard's army at Manassas. In 1862 he commanded all the Confederate forces in Virginia, and at the battle of Fair Oaks, near Richmond, May 31, 1862, was seriously wounded. Although Jefferson Davis was hostile to him, in November 1862 he was assigned to the military department of Tennessee. In April 1863, he reported himself unable to do active duty. Later in the spring of 1863, he attempted to relieve Vicksburg, but was defeated at Jackson by General Ulysses S. Grant May 14, and retreated to Canton, Mississippi. After General Braxton Bragg was defeated by General Grant, at Chattanooga, November 25, 1863, General Johnston was given command of the forces of the Southwest. With an army of 35,000 men he fortified the position of the Confederate Army at Dalton, Georgia. General William T. Sherman attacked the Confederate forces with superior Federal forces, and General Johnston's army was driven across the Chattahoochee. General Johnston reached Atlanta in July, and was determined to hold it to the end. Authorities at Richmond were dissatisfied and on July 17, 1864, he was ordered to turn over his command to General J. B. Hood. Near the end of February 1865, after General Sherman had captured Atlanta, marched to Savannah and into South Carolina. Johnston at Lee's request, was assigned to the command of the army of Tennessee, and all troops in South Carolina, Georgia and Florida. His objective was to concentrate all available forces and drive back Sherman. He was defeated at Bentonville, N. C.

After the close of the war General Johnston engaged in civic endeavors. In 1874 he published a Narrative of Military Operations during the Civil War. In 1877 he was elected to represent the Richmond District in Congress, and in 1887 he was appointed United States commissioner of railroads by President Cleveland.

It was not Johnston's good fortune to acquire the glory of Lee and Jackson nor did he possess the power of enforcing his will on others to the same degree, but his methods were exact, his strategy calm and balanced, his steadiness unsurpassed." In the spring of 1890, an invitation to attend memorial exercises in Atlanta brought him a warm welcome. He rode with General Kirby - Smith in a flower bedecked carriage drawn by a pair of coal black horses, with the Governor's Horse Guard as an escort. As they moved to take their place in the procession, a shout went up from the crowd: "That's Johnston! That's Joe Johnston!" Men who had served under him pushed forward and surrounded the carriage. Amid shouts and yells they lifted the vehicle and its occupants from the ground. Finally, some one shouted, Take the horses away! In a moment the team was out of the traces and the carriage moved forward drawn by the veterans."

The depth of his patriotism was evidenced by the fact that he served as honorary pallbearer for his former opponent and friend, General William T. Sherman. The funeral was held on a chill day in mid - February 1891. General Johnston contracted a severe cold which aggravated a serious heart condition. He died in Washington, D. C., March 21, 1891.

Which twin has the dryer?

The twin who saves herself clothesline drudgery also saves money with her gentle, fast electric dryer. An authoritative study by the American Home Laundry Manufacturers' Association indicates average families with dryers spend $125 less a year for clothes and linens than similar families using a clothesline. Savings enough to pay for your electric dryer in just two years! And right now, there's an extra saving.
